Lisa Klug is an experienced lawyer, manager and trainer with excellent analytical skills and an understanding of workplace dynamics. She has experience in many different workplace cultures and their particular issues, having worked at Universities, government agencies, private law firms and local government. As a consultant at Worklogic Pty Ltd she has used this experience to provide a wide range of services to clients including:

- Complex investigations into allegations of bullying and other workplace misconduct;
- Workplace reviews to identify workplace issues to be addressed before they escalate into a complaint or legal action;
- Group training in a range of topics including effective communication, negotiation and mediation skills.
- Large project reviews regarding the examination of files against employment processes including suggested recommendations for improving processes.

Lisa started her career as a litigation lawyer in major commercial law firms where she was principally involved in insurance litigation and advising on workplace-related legislation. She developed high level analytical and conflict resolution skills while conducting trials and negotiated settlements which involved tight time-limits and challenging issues and behaviours.

Later she managed the knowledge management service in a commercial law firm, gaining first-hand experience of workplace issues including accommodating flexible working arrangements, return to work after maternity leave, performance management, and staff retention.

Lisa is also an effective and engaging trainer and enjoys preparing and providing training programs and papers on current workplace issues for employers.

Lisa is committed to excellent client service and strives to work with clients to resolve complex disputes and provide the best possible outcomes before the problem escalates. She is currently undertaking a Masters of Workplace and Employment Laws. This further study informs and distinguishes her work at Worklogic Pty Ltd.
